The Nation.

Vol. 57, No. 1490

The character and efficiency of work among "the unorganized" depends largely on the quality of public interest, to whatever degree of wealth or status, work is connected with the welfare and prosperity of the community. It is not only in the sphere of education and social services, but also in the sphere of economic development, that the interests of the community are most acutely felt. In the case of the "unorganized" worker, the problem is one of organizing and developing his interests, so that they may be recognized and harnessed for the common good. The efforts of the community in this direction are an important factor in the development of labor and industrial relations, and will be increasingly recognized as a vital element in the solution of the problems of society.