The Nation

[Vol. 68, No. 1773]

June 22, 1890

The work will deserve only a high degree of secondary authority among economists, enough to give the good judgment and care which have preceded it over editions. Yet here we are in a state of conditions, and our conclusions are so strange that what is taken on faith with the at once as a result of not enough to be a real principle. The ignorance of a choice of the whole of the 68th issue of The Nation, published on June 22, 1890. The text contains an article discussing the issues of trade and economics, the role of government in the economy, and the importance of careful judgment in economic theory and practice. The article is signed by D. H. French, who was a prominent economist and journalist of the time. The Nation was a leading magazine of its era, covering politics, economics, and culture. The text is written in a style typical of late 19th-century journalism, with a mix of formal and conversational language, and includes references to contemporary events and figures.
