The Nation

Nov. 9, 1899

Bose University, Aleutian Islands. On the night before the World's Fair, at 4 A.M., there was an earthquake in the region. The buildings were shaken, and the earthquakes were felt in the neighboring islands. The damage was considerable, and many people were injured. The cause of the earthquake was not immediately known, but it is generally assumed that it was caused by volcanic activity.

In a letter to "The New York Times," published in the Times of Britain, the writer expressed his concern about the damage caused by the earthquake. He stated that the earthquake was a natural disaster, and that it was dreadful to think of the suffering caused by it.

The writer also expressed his sympathy with the people of the region, and his hope that they would be able to recover from the disaster.

In his letter, the writer also mentioned the dreadful destruction caused by the earthquakes in the region, and his concern about the damage caused to the buildings and infrastructure.

The writer concluded his letter by expressing his grief and sympathy with the people of the region, and his hope that they would be able to recover from the disaster.

The letter was published in the Times of Britain on November 9, 1899.
The Nation.

[Vol. 59, No. 1793]