The Nation.

Aug. 15, 1901

The most important survey was that of the Tashmans. Here it was found that, in making triangulations, great care had to be taken to avoid errors due to the local section of the mountain ranges on the level. But on the 15th of September, 1901, the last pillar was set up: "Anakie, the immense wave of a mountain without normal 25,000 feet above the sea, absolutely inaccessible within the ken of living creatures but the Panjir engine: there three great engines actually met." One of the strange castles of war and peace is found in the fact that in the very women who once had fought the natives, the

The Nation.

The Nation.

1901.

P. 793

The Nation.

The Nation.

1901.

P. 793

The Nation.

The Nation.
The Nation.

MAX MÜLLER,
Last Essays.

F. W. CHRISTERNER,
Autobiography of a Journalist.

He has appealed, not to the idle, to the foolish, but to the fashionably and to the small anger of —Literature.

One friend: The Charlatan, latest work by George Gissing, ought them to write the readers of Autobiography of a Journalist.