under the Empress to the staff of the Journal des Débats, the most highly reputed of the French newspapers.

"It was," says Primo de Ricci in his post, "at the height of the French Revolution. Our country, for nearly a century, had been fighting for its existence, and our papers were full of virulent attacks on the enemies of the Republic. It was at this difficult time that Primo de Ricci showed his true mettle. He was a strong-willed man, and when he saw that the enemies of the Republic were using every means to undermine its foundations, he determined to fight them with all his strength. He was a great orator, and he used his eloquence to rally the people to the defense of the Republic. He was a great statesman, and he used his wisdom to guide the country through the stormy days of the Revolution. He was a great patriot, and he used his love for his country to inspire his countrymen to fight for their freedom. And so, Primo de Ricci became the leader of the French Revolution, and his name will always be remembered as one of the great names in the annals of French history."

The wisdom of Primo de Ricci is a source of inspiration to all mankind. He showed us that it is possible to overcome even the most difficult problems, if we have the courage to do so. He showed us that it is possible to win even the most difficult battles, if we have the will to do so. And he showed us that it is possible to build even the most difficult foundations, if we have the determination to do so. Therefore, let us remember the lessons of Primo de Ricci, and let us use them to guide our actions in the future. Let us remember that it is possible to overcome any difficulty, if we have the courage to do so. Let us remember that it is possible to win any battle, if we have the will to do so. And let us remember that it is possible to build any foundation, if we have the determination to do so.}

[Vol. 75, No. 1955]

A friend of mine, a prominent lawyer, was at a party recently. He told me that he had just received a letter from a client who had been involved in a bitter legal dispute. The client was a wealthy businessman who had invested millions of dollars in a new technology, only to see it fail miserably. The businessman was so frustrated that he threatened to sue everyone involved, including his own lawyers. My friend reassured him that he would do everything in his power to help him win the case. The businessman thanked him and left the party, but a week later he called him again to say that he had decided not to sue after all. My friend was surprised and asked why. The businessman explained that he had realized that the legal case was just a small part of his problems, and that the real issue was his own psychology. He had to confront his own failures and learn from them before he could move on. My friend was impressed by the businessman's wisdom and told me that he was a great example of how to handle difficult situations.
